RETURN Wants to Know What You're Cooking!

Karen Cantor invites you to watch RETURN: Native American Women Reclaim Foodways for Health and Spirit and then share what you are cooking and eating-while at home-on their Facebook page. After all, physical separation does not require social isolation.

In the words of lead character Roxanne Swentzell, "You haven't killed us yet; you haven't crushed us completely yet. Show them that you're not gone yet. Make it be a food revolution." Remember this revolution begins with you!

RETURN: Native American Women Reclaim Foodways for Health and Spirit, a film by Singing Wolf Documentaries, features charismatic Roxanne Swentzell- from Santa Clara Pueblo in New Mexico-whose efforts to reclaim ancient foodways are echoed across the continent by Tlingit, Muckleshoot, Oglala Sioux, Menominee, and Seneca women. At its heart, this film is about empowering people to overcome their current circumstances through eating as their ancestors did - nutritiously and locally. RETURN offers an approach to confronting the diabetes epidemic now rampant in Native American communities.

By Sheri Ratick-Stroud

My friend, Rich West, called me and threw out an idea to do an on-line soap opera. Because we are in isolation we would record our parts individually in our homes and Rich would edit together. This is just a fun thing to keep us busy until the jobs start flowing again. So here is episode one of LOVE IS ONLY SIX FEET AWAY.....

Judy Dwan Hallet

Watch this 19-minute video that Judy Hallet was asked to make for the Sarah Lawrence College alumni eNewsletter, preparing three recipes from her cookbook, Discovering Tunisian Cuisine. It starts with a short introduction explaining a little about her life as a filmmaker and how she got to write a cookbook on Tunisian cuisine. Then she goes downstairs and prepares three simple Tunisian salads. "I felt a little like Julia Child!"

The cookbook can be ordered from Amazon or the Hallet website.

OFFSCREEN with Jillian and Sophia covers hard-hitting topics about the entertainment industry in a lighthearted, sassy, but analytical way. They discuss the film industry as well as the music industry and their similarities and differences when dealing with hard-hitting social issues. Hot topics of the week and ending each episode with their movie, television and music recommendations round out the podcasts.
